grown in Washington needs to read this book! Takes the reader into a place; one with a sense of taste! By Sketchpub@aol.com The Wine Project is deceptive. It is more than just about wine and a place, although it faithfully provides that. It is also about time, about how we experience time. The authors use the present to talk about the past, to bring the past into the immediate present. The Wine Project chronicles the life-effort of co-author Dr. Walter J. Clore to convince farmers in eastern Washington state that they could grow the right grapes and produce distinctive, world-class wines. It is a mystery, a thriller. It is good history. It is a good read! And your life will be changed forever as you fall in love with the scientist, Dr. Clore. And, as you feel the excitement of the authors as they find connections in their everyday life to the past. As the co-author I am always amazed to pick up the book and read a chapter, and wonder at the way it reads. You will like it. Let me know if you do, or don't. This review written by co-author, Ronald Irvine.

Anyone, ranging from a wine professional, enthusiast, home winemaker or a person just interested in another aspect of Washington State history, will find this book full of insight into the beginnings and future of the world class wines of Washington, the land it is grown in and the past and present players involved. It is told in large part by the leading scientist who helped create the industry in Washington. While at times clumsy due to its occasional stringing together of anecdotal passages, the book remains essential to those wishing to learn more about one of the recognized emerging areas in the world for the growing of premium grapes and the resulting production of fine wines
